CARNEGIE COMMISSION CITES ROLE OF COMMUNITY COLLEGES.....

A new role for community colleges which would make these institutions the cornerstone of the higher education structure in the United States has been advocated by a recently released report of the Carnegie Commission on Higher Education.

The basic recommendation of the third report by the Commission was for the establishment of 230 new community colleges by 1980 so that one will exist within commuting distance of every potential student.

Clark Kerr stated in the report that the community college is "particularly responsive to the changing educational and occupational needs of our society as we approach the 21st century."

Last Friday, Dr. Betty Woodward, associate professor of biology on leave from the college, died at Our Lady of Perpetual Help Home in Atlanta, and graveside services were held Sunday at Floral Hills Memory Gardens.

On Wednesday, President Downs announced at the faculty meeting that Dr. Woodward's family had established a "Betty Woodward Scholarship Fund" at the college, and the following resolution was adopted:

"The faculty of Clayton Junior College wishes to express its feeling of deep regret and great loss of the passing of Doctor Betty Woodward. All who knew her recognized the great dedication she had for the profession, the true concern she had for the student, and her personal drive for perfection.

"She will be missed by her colleagues, but perhaps more importantly, she will be missed by her students. Few teachers have equalled Betty Woodward's ability to inspire the students in the classroom. Through her efforts, her students became dedicated professionalists.

"It is our hope that the Betty Woodward Scholarship Fund will serve as a reminder of her greatness to the faculty of Clayton Junior College and will cause us all to attempt to reach the heights attained by Doctor Betty Woodward."

INTRODUCING

came to Clayton as assistant professor of psychology in the fall quarter of 1969.

Previously, he was at the University of Georgia, where he received his Master's Degree in psychology in 1966, and is a candidate for a Ph.D. in clinical psychology.

A native of New York, Mr. Goldstein did his undergraduate work at the State University of New York at Stony Brook, and his clinical internship in Connecticut. A transplanted southerner, he says that "the weather is the most fantastic thing the South has to offer," pointing out that, while in Connecticut, he once "couldn't find my car for three days because of the snow."

This, combined with the fact that he finds the academic more appealing than full-time clinical work, led Mr. Goldstein to turn down a scholarship offer from Connecticut which would have committed him to clinical work afterward to take one at the University of Georgia.

During his five years there, Mr. Goldstein said that he noticed a great change in the atmosphere of the university itself, and also acquired two interests not included on the standard training-of-psychologists list.

"When I first went there," he said, "Georgia was very much the traditional southern university, with fraternities playing a major role in the social life; while I was there, I saw a lot of that change."

"Unlike most psychologists," he continued, "I am interested in physiology, and while I was at Georgia I spent a year in the vet school taking courses."

During that time, Mr. Goldstein was requested to write an article on "The Psychotherapeutic Value of Pets," which was later published in a veterinarian magazine. "Pets definitely do have a psychotherapeutic value," he says, "and are one of the ways people can be taught to relate to people by first teaching them to relate to another living thing."

Mr. Goldstein also became interested in hypnosis at Georgia, and its potential use in psychological treatment. Most psychologists, he points out, do not use hypnotherapy, first because Freud stopped using it after a facial operation made it painful for him to speak--thus causing those who followed him to discontinue its use--and, second, because of its frequent use as a stage trick.

Mr. Goldstein, however, has published articles on "Hypnosis and Hypnotherapy" and "Hypnotically Induced Amnesia versus Ablation of Memory," and will write his Ph.D. dissertation on hypnosis and auditory perception. He has recently received a certificate from the American Institute of Hypnosis.

Mr. Goldstein was married in August, and he and his wife, a registered nurse from New York, have recently bought a house in DeKalb County.

INTRODUCING

TERRY VACALIS...

An intrepid instructor of physical education who this week broke two fingers when he dropped a weight on his hand. Mr. Vacalis, formerly a fearsome sight, may now be seen around campus holding up his two bandaged fingers in the symbol of "Peace".

Beside his prowess in the gymnasium, Mr. Vacalis bills himself as "the world's greatest chess player, who has consistently beaten Mr. Bolander in a tournament which began when he and his wife moved into the Embassy Row Apartments, situated in beautiful downtown Forest Park next to the Farmer's Market."

There Mr. Vacalis and his wife also hang out with their 20 month old son, Steve, who, Vacalis states, "was doing a 400 lb. press when he was three months old."

Originally, Mr. Vacalis is from Athens, and so is his wife: Athens, Ga. and Athens, Greece. Mr. Vacalis's parents are by birth Greek, although, he says, they came to this country on a ráft tied blindfold to the mast in accordance with ancient Greek myths.

Mr. Vacalis, therefore, grew up in Athens, Ga. instead of the ancient Greek capitol, and attended the University of Georgia. There he obtained both the B.S. and Master's degrees, learning Judo and Karate and gleaning honors and publications along the way.

During one summer, Mr. Vacalis returned to his parents' native land to serve as a translator for an American firm, and he met his wife in Athens during a second trip to Europe.

He has also taught at the University of Georgia, where he was named the "out-standing Graduate Assistant" in 1969, a year in which, it is obvious, he didn't drop any weights on his hand.
